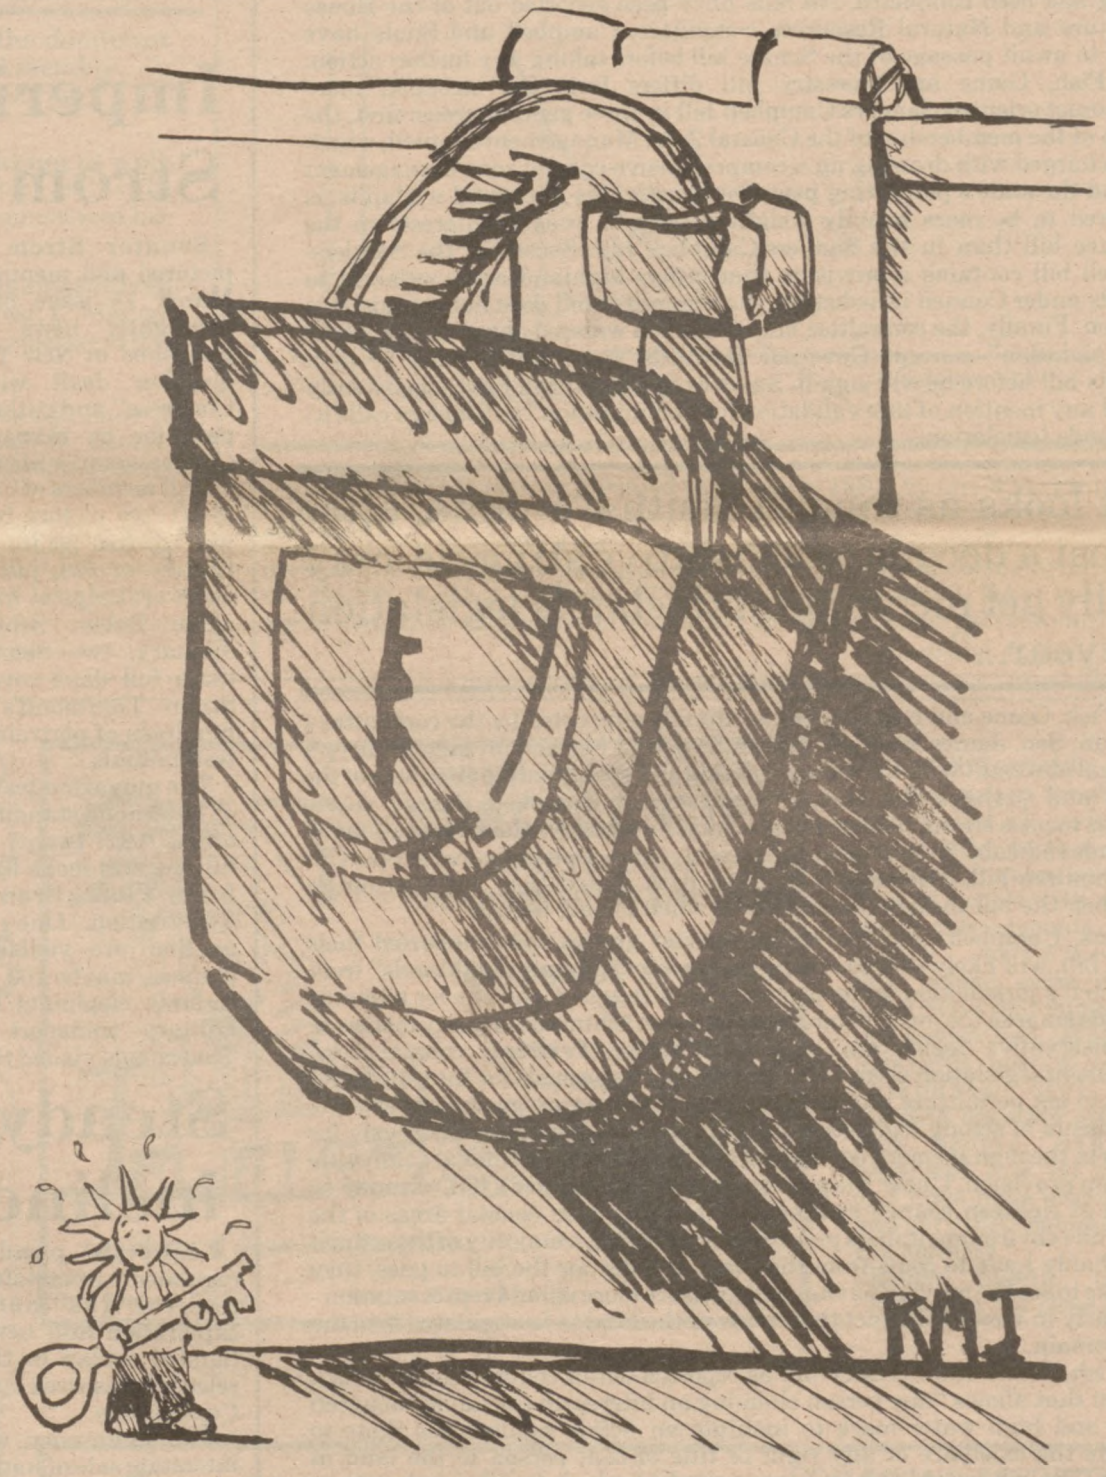
Freedom of information: is the door still locked?

illustration by Ruth Johnson

by John Norton



When the South Carolina General Assembly passed the Freedom of Information (FOI) law in 1972, it was described by its author as "an historic bill--a landmark bill." Upon signing the legislation, Governor John C. West remarked that the law was "one of the most progressive pieces of legislation in recent years." West's remarks were probably accurate; progressive legislation has never marched forth from the general assembly at regimental strength. But has the bill lived up to the promise made in Section Two of the original legislation; that it would make it possible "for citizens, or their representatives, to learn and to report fully the activities of their public officials?"

The Southern Regional Council didn't think so in 1975 when they issued a study of the South Carolina freedom of information act: "Government in the Sunshine - Emphasis: South Carolina."

The South Carolina law, researchers Ronald L. Plesser and Peter J. Petkas found, contains "a strong statement of legislative intent that South Carolina is to have open government at every level," but while the researchers found a good deal of optimism among public citizens about how the law was working, their analysis of the legislation suggested "the optimism may be unwarranted."

The best thing about the law, the researchers said, was a provision that allows citizens to apply to the state's circuit courts for injunctive relief to enforce the law's provisions. If a public agency refuses to permit a citizen to attend meetings or obtain documents, the court after receiving a citizen's complaint may order the agency to comply with the law.

But the SRC study found several "serious defects" in the 1972 law. "Perhaps most serious," the report states, is a provision that "permits a public agency to deny access to records when it believes the public interest is best served by nondisclosure." The 1975 study also found that the law "allows public authorities, by a simple majority vote, to enter into 'executive' or closed sessions without stating any reason for excluding the public."

The researchers came to the conclusion that the "ultimate effectiveness of the law" would depend on the judicial interpretation given to these two provisions and "upon the extent officials rely on them to close government to the people." In the case of release of public documents, the researchers said, the concept of "the public interest" was too elusive, and "unfortunately, under laws that grant broad discretion, judges are reluctant to reverse any agency's judgement about the public interest."

As an example of the problem in determining the "public interest," the researchers cited a federal situation (later corrected) in which the Social Security Administration maintained that disclosure of nursing home inspection records it had on file was not in the public interest. The SSA argued that while a nursing home might be in substantial compliance with existing laws, there might be "minor" deficiencies, "such as cockroaches in the kitchen or a strip of flammable carpeting." Releasing this information might discourage people from using these homes even though inspectors had deemed them to be adequate facilities. "This type of argument," the SRC report stated, "though plausible, can be used to justify 'secrecy in the public interest' in almost any situation."

The SRC report included other criticisms. In the area of public documents, the researchers found several procedural flaws. When a document is denied to the public, the Attorney General can review it to determine if it is in "the public interest," but he is not required to do so; if he does not then the citizen has no recourse but to "resort to court action." There are no specific provisions in the law which permit the court to award fees and costs to a citizen who sues successfully. The law establishes no deadlines for decisions about whether a document is public, and it does not require any agency to give "detailed reasons for refusals to disclose."

The SRC study also found other flaws in the sections of the law dealing with public meetings. While the law "may have created a new air of openness in South Carolina," the report states, "there are some glaring deficiencies in it." The researchers found there is no provision in the law for adequate notice to be given of public meetings. "Of what use can an open meeting be if no one knows where and when it is to occur" the report asks. And there is no requirement, Plesser and Petkas found, that minutes of meetings be recorded and made available to the public. "If openness in government is to be a reality, some mechanism must be provided for the citizen to find out what happened at a meeting after it has occurred."

As already cited, the SRC report was critical of provisions in the 1972 law that allow executive

It looks as though South Carolina, after almost a decade of legislative struggle, may finally get meaningful tidelands legislation this year.

In the early weeks of this legislative session, a half-dozen "tidelands" or coastal zone management bills were floating around the House and Senate. A bill backed by the state's environmental organizations and the League of Women Voters was introduced simultaneously in the House and Senate by Rep. Bill Campbell (D-Richland) and Sen. Alex Sanders (D-Richland), right on the heels of a weaker bill introduced in the Senate by Sen. Dewey Wise (D-Charleston). Rep. Martin Sauls (D-Jasper) added his two-cents worth with a variation of the Wise bill he introduced in the House. A fifth piece of legislation, which was written by the state's Coastal Zone Management Council and was generally conceded to be the Governor's (read: conservative) tidelands bill, failed to find a sponsor in either the House or Senate and was therefore never actually introduced.

In late February, the Senate Fish, Game and Forestry committee reported out its own version of tidelands legislation. The Fish, Game and Forestry bill is a synthesis of the Sanders-Campbell and Wise bills. Debate on the bill in the Senate has been deferred until after debate on the death penalty bill now pending has been completed. No bills have been reported out of the House Agriculture and Natural Resources committee; Campbell and Sauls have decided to await passage of the Senate bill before taking any further action.

The Fish, Game and Forestry bill differs from the stronger, more protectionist-oriented Sanders-Campbell bill in three general areas: first, the makeup of the membership of the Coastal Zone Management Council, which will be charged with drawing up a comprehensive coastal zone management plan and the state's permitting power over activities in coastal wetlands, is considered to be more heavily weighted towards coastal interests in the committee bill than in the Sanders-Campbell bill. Secondly, the Sanders-Campbell bill contains a provision that brings highland areas adjacent to wetlands under Council jurisdiction; the committee bill does not contain this provision. Finally, the committee bill contains a watered-down version of the "title validation" concept Governor Edwards has insisted must be in a tidelands bill before he will sign it. Sanders and Campbell have consistently opposed any mention of title validation (or "invalidation" as Sanders calls it) in tidelands legislation.

> "...It looks as though South Carolina, after almost a decade of legislative struggle, may finally get meaningful tidelands legislation this year..."

The Fish, Game and Forestry bill is strongly supported by the committee's chairman, Sen. James Waddell (D-Beaufort), and his support should carry a great deal of weight with the more moderate and conservative members of the Senate, and perhaps the House. Sanders and Campbell, whose yearly struggles to pass strong tidelands legislation have gained them reputations as "tidelands radicals" in the General Assembly, have also indicated support for the committee bill, although they have both stated they will attempt to strengthen the bill through amendments when debate begins.

Sanders, Campbell, and the public interest groups that supported their original bill, will likely concede to the omission of "adjacent highlands" from the Council's jurisdiction without much of a struggle. Control over adjacent highlands smacks too much of land use control in the minds of many moderate and conservative legislators, and proponents of strong coastal zone management legislation seem willing to set this issue aside for the time being in order to get permitting and management planning programs underway.

Proponents of strong legislation are expected to lobby more vigorously for changes in the management council's makeup and for the removal of any title validation provision. Under the provisions of the committee's bill, as many as fourteen of eighteen council members could come from coastal areas of the state. While environmentalists privately concede that a majority of the council will probably have to come from the coast in order for the bill to pass, they would like to see the provisions changed to insure more upland representation--particularly in view of the fact that much of the land to be regulated is in the public domain.

The Fish, Game and Forestry bill as reported out of committee contains a provision that allows "any person claiming an interest in tidelands" between the low and high water mark to institute an action against the State to determine the existence of any right or title of that person to the land in question. The bill provides a five-year period in which to take such action. Basically, this section of the bill provides for a blanket right to sue the state--rather than having to obtain permission from the state in each individual situation—and would, barring appeal, allow juries rather than judges to decide on claims. The provision is much weaker than the one contained in the governor's proposed legislation. His bill (ostensibly authored by the Coastal Zone Management Council, which is dominated by appointees favorable to his position) provided that an individual could claim title to tidelands if he could demonstrate a 60-year unbroken chain of ownership. Present case and common law requires that claimants must be able to demonstrate title through a grant from the state, the Lords Proprietor, or the King of England.

Waddell and his committee rejected this concept but decided to include the blanket right-to-sue provision, presumably with the intention of placating to some extent the governor and his supporters. Sanders and Campbell and their

Thurmond with plaques

Imperial Strom

Senator Strom Thurmond was pictured and mentioned briefly in the March 18 issue of New Times, a fortnightly news feature magazine published in New York. The article in question dealt with the "Imperial Congress" and outlined the little extras paid for by taxpayers that make a Congressman's life more bearable.

"All members of Congress are entitled to 50 free picture framings a year, as well as free prints from the National Gallery of Art, just in case they run short of things to frame," New Times editor Robert Schrum wrote. "Last January, two Senate nailmen spent three full days covering the walls of Strom Thurmond's new office with hundreds of portraits, illustrations and testimonials."

The magazine features a photograph of Thurmond standing in the door of his office. After twenty-three years on the hill, he still looks like he just drove up from Plum Branch to visit the Constitution. One wall and part of another are visible; we estimate 80 plaques, maybe 100. Not shown are the ceramic elephants hauled back on a military transport plane when the Thurmonds visited the far east recently.

Economic pundits who claim regulated interstate prices in the natural gas market discourage exploration and new well starts were handed a slap in the face by figures released this week by the Federal Power Commission.

The commission, which regulates the interstate sale of natural gas, released a report by its office of Policy Analysis which shows the number of gas wells drilled in the third quarter of 1976 is up significantly over the same period the previous year. The FPC reported that the number of gas wells drilled during the quarter was up 19.2 percent over the same period in 1975. Developmental and exploratory gas well footage increased by 17.4 and 25.3 percent respectively.

Interestingly enough production for the same period decreased, showing a drop of 6.2 percent. Prices, however, reached an all-time record high nearly doubling over the period. Prices paid by interstate pipelines increased to $1.13 per thousand cubic feet as compared to 61¢ per thousand cubic feet during the third quarter of 1975.

The FPC noted the latest rate of production was the lowest of any quarter since 1968, but the figures do show who is getting the best piece of the pie. While there was an overall decline in production for interstate sales of 6.2 percent the production for sale to the unregulated intrastate market declined only 1.8 percent.

One of the most telling parts of the FPC report, however, was not the third quarter figures, but the overall production charts for the last five years which were included in the report. All of the FPC's production indicators, total drilling rigs, exploratory wells, and total drilling activity, showed a sharp decline in the last two quarters of 1973 and the first two quarters of 1974. For those of you with poor memories this was the beginning of the alleged "energy crisis."

The report also noted the production of gas has been on a steady decline since 1968. That date has no meaning on the surface, but in the history of gas regulation it was a crucial one.

In 1968 the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Federal Power Commission could regulate the price of "new gas" unless the rate of new gas discoveries showed a decline. Lo and behold the rate of new gas discoveries has been declining ever since.

Lest someone feel the FPC is juggling the production figures for the gas industry it might be noted the commission gets all its figures from the American Gas Association - the gas producers lobbying association.

The FPC does however have raw data available from government leased fields in the Gulf of Mexico. In 1974 the US Geological Survey made its own study of these fields and found that for 153 out of 220 fields, where data were comparable, its own estimates were 63 percent higher than those of the AGA.

What it all means is that the country could possess upward of 100 trillion cubic feet more than the 228 trillion feet the gas industry says we have.

The chief counsel for the AGA, when faced with these findings admitted, "We would certainly concede that many of these errors -- not errors, but many of these actions, if they err--err on the side of conservatism." Stated another way - they err on the side of the gas companies, which earn a guaranteed rate of return on investment of 15 to 18 percent even under regulated prices.

Perhaps the gas situation was best summed up by one Omaha-based pipeline executive. "The gas goes where the money is," he said.

Nuclear industry critics were given a boost last week when a federal judge ruled an important piece of pro-nuclear legislation unconstitutional.

Judge James B. McMillan ruled Thursday in Charlotte that the controversial Price-Anderson Act, reported on two weeks ago by Osceola, tends to encourage irresponsibility in matters of safety and environmental protection. McMillan ruled the act unconstitutional, saying it violated the equal protection clause of the Fifth Amendment.

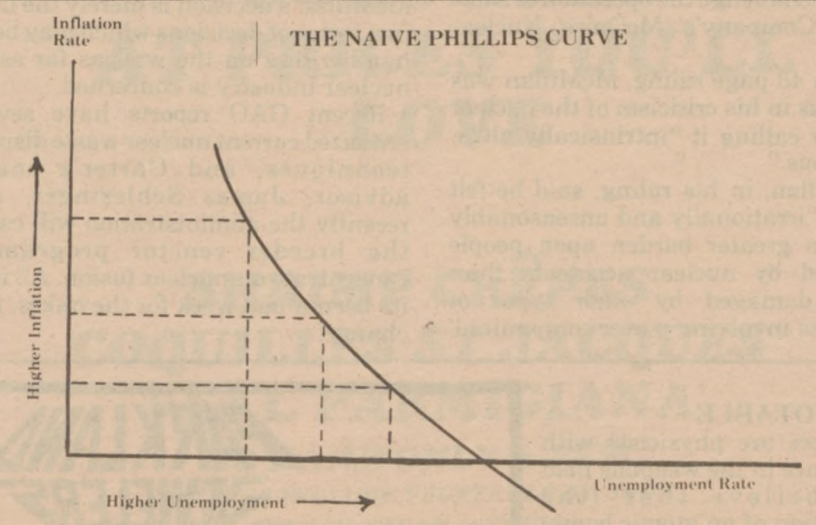
The Phillips Phallacy

Simplistic and erroneous concepts of economic theory can sometimes wield overbearing power in the precincts of political economy. The classic example of our time must be that of the Phillips Curve doctrine. For the theoretical, hypothetical mechanism of the Phillips Curve has given sanction to the national economic policy of the last two Republican administrations. In simplest terms, it has recommended deliberate creation of unemployment as a "necessity" to controlling inflation. But lately, in the Carter administration, the Phillips Curve may be losing its death-grip on the economy. Presidential economic advisor Charles Schulze denounces the notion of a Phillips Curve relationship as a fallacy cherished by Wall Street lobbyists such as former Treasury Secretary William Simon and such as the editorial writers of the Wall Street Journal.



The Phillips Curve was invented in the early 1950s by one W.A. Phillips, then an economics professor at the London School of Economics (where Mick Jagger did his graduate work). Phillips postulated a statistical relationship between the rate of price change (inflation) and the rate of unemployment in the British national economy of the early postwar period. What was the connection, the link between inflation and unemployment in the relationship?

"The act violates the clause because it provides for what Congress deemed the benefit of the whole society (the generation of nuclear power) but places the cost of that benefit on an arbitrarily chosen segment of society, those injured by a nuclear catastrophe," McMillan said.

McMillan was referring to that part of the act which limits liability to $560 million in the event of a nuclear accident, even though the government's own figures indicate damages would amount to billions of dollars.

McMillan's ruling came as a result of a suit filed against the Atomic Energy Commission (now the Nuclear Regulatory Commission) by the Carolina Environmental Study Group.

The suit had been part of the group's effort to challenge the operation of Duke Power Company's McQuire Nuclear station.

In his 43 page ruling, McMillan was relentless in his criticism of the nuclear industry calling it "intrinsically ultra-hazardous."

McMillan, in his ruling, said he felt the act "irrationally and unreasonably places a greater burden upon people damaged by nuclear accidents than people damaged by other types of accidents involving power companies."

McMillan said his ruling came partly because it is "impossible to predict with certainty the extent or severity of the consequences."

The decision, if upheld, could limit or delay the construction of new nuclear plants because it would require utilities to increase their liability insurance.

The utilities have consistently expressed their reluctance to do this, first by their extensive lobbying for the passage of the Price-Anderson Act, and then by their lobbying to get the government to increase its portion of the Price-Anderson subsidy.

Curiously McMillan did not express any opinion on the fact that of the $560 million limit the government underwrites—via the taxpaying public—somewhere in the neighborhood of $500 million of this amount. He could have at least made a case for taxation without representation.

Duke officials said, of course, they would appeal the decision. But McMillan's decision is merely the latest in a series of decisions which may be the handwriting on the wall as far as the nuclear industry is concerned.

Recent GAO reports have severly criticized current nuclear waste disposal techniques, and Carter's energy advisor, James Schlesinger, said recently the administration will cancel the breeder reactor program to concentrate on nuclear fusion. All in all its been a bad week for the nukes, for a change!

supporters have repeatedly stated their objections to any mention of title validation in coastal zone mangement legislation. They maintain it is strictly a matter for the courts to decide, on an individual basis. Some environmentalists fear that the blanket right-to-sue will lead to drawn-out court battles and might even result in changes in the present case law.

Sanders and Campbell are expected to fight for amendments removing the title validation section; how hard they will fight will depend on their assessment of the mood of the legislature on this issue. If necessary, they may concede to the provision's inclusion in order to get the bill passed.

Debate on the Fish, Game and Forestry bill should begin in the Senate sometime this month. If the bill is not weakened with amendments, Campbell and Sauls are expected to support it in the House, with Campbell pushing for some strengthening amendments. Campbell believes the prospects for final passage are good: "most of the people interested in tidelands legislation are of a common mind this year," he says. And with Waddell, Sanders, and Campbell working together as a coalition, his optimism seems warranted.

If the bill does pass both houses, it still faces the possibility of a gubernatorial veto. Edwards has threatened to veto any bill that does not deal with the private ownership question. In early March, the governor said he found the committee bill "more palatable" than two bills he vetoed last year--primarily due to the inclusion of the title validation provision. If that provision is removed through the amendment process, the governor may once again veto the legislation. But the bill's supporters have indicated they think the governor's veto can be overridden this year. "I don't think the governor's veto is a factor," he says. "His position's untenable. If the bill is accepted by the House and Senate, and supported by all interested parties, he won't be able to stop it."

By all logic, it was what can be called "worker illusion." The meaning of the Phillips Curve trade-off suggested that employment could be increased by offering workers the illusion of higher wages. In other words, if entreprenuers paid wages which were denominated in higher nominal dollars but lower real dollars, workers wouldn't notice that they were being cheated. The conclusion is that the Phillips Curve will only work on a rather stupid labor force. For once workers begin to anticipate the inflation, they will begin to demand higher real wages, not merely higher nominal ones. And the Phillips Curve shifts out to the right, requiring ever larger doses of inflation to lower unemployment.

So what results, in monetary theory, are three versions of the Phillips Curve model, none of them with much validity. The simple Phillips curve as here explained is called the "naive" Phillips Curve, and is discounted by most economists. Milton Friedman invented an "accelerationist" Phillips Curve which claimed that workers do anticipate inflation, and thus that the Phillips Curve relationship works only if expected inflation matches actual inflation. That is, Friedman suggested workers are not so stupid, and thus are not fooled by higher nominal wages that buy them less real goods and services.

As a compromise, MIT economist Robert Solow offered that people do adjust to inflation, but not fully. Hence Solow's Phillips Curve was midway between Phillip's hyperbolic one and Friedman's vertical one.

"...That is, Friedman suggested workers are not so stupid, and thus are not fooled by higher nominal wages that buy them less real goods and services..."

But the Phillips Curve, even in its more sophisticated form, glides over the fact that inflation and unemployment are two different phenomena, with different causes and different effects on society. In crude terms, inflation can be caused by excess demand, or insufficient supply, or an excess of dollars in the economy. And since during an inflation bankers and investors are paid back by borrowers in cheaper dollars then the ones they borrowed, it is the class of capitalists who are hurt by inflation. On the other side, unemployment can be caused by insufficient demand, or excess supply, or a scarcity of dollars in the economy. Obviously, unemployment hurts working people, especially marginal working people--those less skilled, less educated workers who are the first fired in a recession.

Clearly, the trade-off between inflation and unemployment implies a trade-off, a struggle, between the rich and the poor. But the conflict is contrived, for even if the Phillips Curve actually held valid in England for a few years of the 1950s, the evidence is that the relationship does not hold true in the United States, or the Great Britain for that matter, of the 1970s. One who attempts to fit a statistical Phillips Curve from available inflation and unemployment data today will not discover a neat curve. Instead he will find a crazy mishmash of zagging, crisscrossing lines on his graph. In short, the relationship doesn't exist.

And what therefore are the policy implications? They are simply that we need not continue this timid national policy of deliberate recession in order to "stop" inflation. It hasn't worked, and cannot. For despite the nervousness of the frightened old women on Wall Street, and Republican bankers lulled by the phony prescriptions of past administrations, economic growth, i.e., deliberate and strong stimulus, is the only cure for inflation and unemployment. The Phillips Curve should be relegated to the Elysian Field of economic mythology.

sessions by majority vote. Although the law includes a catalogue of reasons why an executive session can be called and provides that meetings which do not fit into these categories must be open, the law originally contained no requirement that the public body explain why (for which specific reason) it was going into executive session. The SRC report was very critical of this omission. In 1976, after the report was completed, the law was amended to require presiding officers to announce the purpose of executive sessions and to require any actions taken in executive sessions to be formally ratified in public.

While this amendment did bring about some minor reform in the FOI law, the major problem involving executive sessions was overlooked. As the SRC researchers pointed out, the definitions of what constitutes an executive session are very broad. They include, for example, the discussion and consideration of "administrative briefings and committee reports," as well as "private matters presented by individuals or groups of citizens."

The researcher's fear that laws granting broad discretion make judges reluctant to reverse agency decisions were realized in a recent Richland County case involving the District One School Board. The Richland County Education Association brought suit alledging the school district was violating the FOI law by holding closed briefings to consider a proposed school budget. The RCEA argued they could have not input into the budget if they were not privy to papers and discussions relating to it. Acting circuit judge Joseph R. Moss, former chief justice of the state supreme court, decided in favor of the school district. The FOI law, he stated, "without any limitation provides categorically that all administrative briefings shall be permitted in executive session." He added that the district was within its rights to withhold the proposed budget documents because they were "incomplete working papers...utilized for staff administrative briefings," and the FOI law protects such papers as "materials for administrative briefings."

Various attempts have been made to strengthen the FOI Act since 1972. Members of the press, civic and public advocacy groups, and Governor James Edwards have supported amendments to strengthen the bill, but with the exception of two amendments passed in May, 1976, the law remains unchanged. As already noted, one of the 1976 amendments required public bodies to give a reason why they were going into executive session, but did nothing to make the definition of such sessions more specific. The other 1976 amendment provided for the first time a penalty for persons "wilfully" violating the provisions of the act -- it was little more than a handslap, a misdemeanor violation providing for a one hundred dollar fine or thirty days in jail.

The Southern Regional Council's study included model state legislation that represented "attempts to reach a compromise between the public's right to know and valid governmental interest in selected confidentiality and non-disclosure." In the last legislative session, Richland County Democrat Bill Campbell introduced a bill based largely on this model legislation in the House of Representatives. The bill didn't get very far.

Campbell Toal Anderson

On March 23, Campbell, Rep. Jean Toal (D-Richland) and Rep. Ralph K. Anderson (D-Florence) reintroduced the model legislation. Prospects for its passage this year, at least by the House, seem fair to good -- depending as always on public support -- and in this case, the support of the state press.

The new legislation (H. 2727), based as it is on the model legislation proposed by SRC's monitoring project, addresses the shortcomings outlined in the SRC document. Specificity is paramount in the new bill. "The basic problem is vagueness in the law we now have," Campbell says. " 'Administrative briefings' in regard to justification for an executive session, like the expression "in the public interest" in regard to documents, is just too broad. The new legislation is very specific and eliminates the possibility of the courts broadly interpreting what may be held or done in secrecy."

The proposed Freedom of Information Act (a.k.a. Sunshine Act), like the present law, addresses the two primary aspects of the public's "right to know," documents and meetings of public bodies.

In the proposed bill, all documents and materials used by public bodies would be open to public inspection unless they were already exempted by statute, or fell into one of these categories: trade secrets; information that would invade personal privacy; records of law enforcement agencies pertaining to revealing the identity of informants, information to be used in a forthcoming law enforcement action, or disclosure of investigation methods.

As the bill's authors have noted, the new legislation "contains an important change in the grievance procedure available to a citizen who has sought access to material in the public record and has been denied." The bill provides that citizens may petition the Attorney General, who would then review the document in question to determine if it can be withheld under the law. If the Attorney General decides it cannot be withheld, and the public agency continues to refuse to release the information, then the Attorney General "shall bring suit in the name of the state "to compel the public body to produce the document. Should the Attorney General decide the document is not a public record, the citizen still has the right to bring suit in circuit court, and if he is successful, the bill provides for the recovery of reasonable costs of litigation.

"Frankly, I think this provision is the real heart of the bill," Campbell says. "What we are doing is changing the law in many respects with regard to the definition of public records. But it's not enough just to change the law; you've got to allow a citizen some recourse other than to take the matter into court. That's just too expensive. And just by virtue of forcing a person into the mechanisms of judicial proceedings, you really cast a chilling effect on someone's efforts to get a public document."

The bill provides a deadline of fifteen days by which time a public body must notify a citizen as to whether a document is a public record; if the agency decides it is not, it must provide reasons why it is not. "This prevents stalling," Campbell says. Another provision designed to expedite access to documents provides that if the matter comes before a court, it will take precedence over all other matters on the court docket "except as to causes...of greater importance."

An important provision in the bill deals with the costs of obtaining documents. As individuals who have sought documents know, some public bodies charge as much as two dollars per page for copies of public records. The Secretary of State's office, for example, charges five dollars for a five-or-six page mimeographed list of state lobbyists. The Campbell-Toal-Anderson bill provides that a "public body may establish and collect fees not to exceed the actual cost of searching for or making copies of records." The section further provides that documents can be provided without charge, and that records are to be presented "in a form that is both convenient and

by Mike Smith

BEIRUT, NOV. 12--A bloody raid on headquarters of the Palestinian liberation group Black September produces a tape recording promising unnamed disaster, and the only person with a clue to its meaning is the young, nude Lebanese woman in the shower that Israeli Major David Kabakov could not bring himself to shoot down.

And so it starts, the amazing quickly ticking time bomb which is "Black Sunday," a film that mixes together so many dramatic genres that it shouldn't be as successful or as entertaining as it is. It's a political thriller and a disaster flick, primarily, with some James Bond gadgetry and derring-do thrown in and several scenes reminiscent of hard-boiled detective capers of the 30s.

Yet it works. It somehow congeals into a whole which is enjoyable to watch, excellently acted for the most part, attractively photographed and professionally directed. It's fine, sturdy craftsmanship as intricate as a Swiss watch or an American computer system.

With breakneck speed, director John Frankenheimer gets us into the middle of things lest the exposition raise questions about just what is coming down. He and his team of scriptwriters don't allow the audience any "horizontal" moments to slow down and think about the holes in either the relationships--both political and personal--which are being presented — the basically hair-brained scheme being developed or the script.

Suffice it to say that the plot concerns a big boom at Miami's Orange Bowl on Super Bowl Sunday, the Goodyear blimp and its deranged pilot, a former POW who got blackballed from the Navy.

Producer Bob Evans, who has brough forth such "biggies" as Love Story, The Godfather Part I (as head of Paramount), Chinatown and Marathon Man, is a money-grabber, to be sure, but he takes his film-making more seriously than do most producers, painstakingly supervising the work which will bear his name.

In a recent interview, he told New York magazine he likes to work with directors who have just worked on a less-than-successful effort because they are more open to compromise and collaboration.

Frankenheimer certainly fits that bill, and so do many of the actors involved. After The Manchurian Candidate, a brilliant early film which Black Sunday resembles, Frankenheimer always seemed to get stymied by scripts. His French Connection II of a few years back was a creditable effort which did little at the box office so he must have seemed a good candidate for Evans.

Here, he does some of his best work. The film absolutely gallops from beginning to end. He builds well the series of shocks and surprises which move the action along, containing them so as not to wear out the audience too soon.

Of the major actors, only Marthe Keller disappoints. Her heavy German accent makes her alleged Arab heritage seem totally implausible. Her voice comes from the screen as if it were the voice of an actress who had dubbed in the sound. What we hear does not sound as if it comes from the actress we see speaking.

A special surprise of "Black Sunday" is the excellent photography and color work of cinematographer John A. Alonzo, who filmed Chinatown, among other recent films. He casts an autumnal pall over this strange football season, with shades of yellow and gold highlighting much of his exterior work. His stunning colors during the two chase scenes--the sea chase filmed against the black of sky and water; the other terminating on a brilliantly lighted beach - are only surpassed by the stern gray of the blimp against the sky blue of Miami in the final moments. His color adds a lyricism to the film which the script does not afford. For example, when Dahlia and her lover blow up a barn to test a new shrapnel-spewing weapon, we are treated to the interior of the barn as sun pours through the several thousand holes the weapon has left in the structure. It is a powerful scene with a macabre beauty.

And surely no football game has been better photographed. The fans are a sea of moving, vibrant colors; his colors and Frankenheimer's long shots from above give the playing field a strange aesthetic beauty, The director alternates between the action of the field and that in the air, making the former appear a bit comical through its insignificance.

"Black Sunday" rushes from start to finish, as any good adventure flick should. That it manages to entertain, offer up some good acting and remain cinematically respectable -- as so few disaster flicks do -- are plusses which place it above the inanities of most of the movies to which it must claim kinship.

Sunshine law

practical for use by the person..." "Obviously," Campbell says, "this keeps an agency from thwarting the spirit of the law by charging too much."

The remainder of H. 2727 deals with meetings of public bodies. It provides that all closed meetings require a two-thirds vote, taken at an open meeting, and further provides that such votes, and the justification for the closed meeting, must be recorded in the minutes.

The bill lists four justifications for closed meetings. Discussions of the character and mental or physical health of an individual may be discussed in a closed meeting -- but not the "professional competence" of an individual. However, the bill provides that the individual under discussion may require such discussions to take place in public. Discussions of appointments are specifically mentioned in the bill as matters to be considered at open meetings. Closed meetings are also allowed for strategy sessions involving collective bargaining, discussion of security personnel or devices, and investigative proceedings "regarding allegations of criminal misconduct." The bill exempts chance or social meetings from the definition of "closed meeting," but adds that such meetings cannot be used "to circumvent the spirit or requirements of this act."

The "meetings" section of the bill also requires all public bodies to give written public notice of all regular meetings at the beginning of each calender year. Supplemental notices are required no later than 72 hours before any meetings not on the regular schedule. Notice includes posting copies, mailing notices to all parties who have asked to be notified, and "making a conscientious effort to notify the news media...efforts made to comply with this requirement shall be noted in the minutes of the meeting..."

The pending legislation also requires all public bodies to keep minutes of all public meetings. Many public agencies, including some committees of the House and Senate, do not keep regular minutes of their meetings -- or even of public hearings. This provision would require them to do so and also provides that the minutes be available to the public within a reasonable time after the meeting. The bill further stipulates that any open meeting may be recorded by any means of "sonic reproduction" so long as the act of recording creates "no active interference with the conduct of the meeting."

> "...Just by virtue of forcing a person into the mechanisms of judicial proceedings, you really cast a chilling effect on someone's efforts to get a public document..."

A final provision in the new bill is likely to create some controversy. The measure drops the penalties provided in the 1976 amendments to the FOI Act and adds this provision: "any person who shall wilfully violate the provisions of this act shall be subject to suspension or removal from office or employment."

" 'Wilfull' may be difficult to prove," Campbell says, "but if it can be proven, we think such an action is justified."

The bill's supporters will attempt to have the bill reported out of the House Judiciary Committee this year. Both Toal and Anderson are members of that committee, and their joint support of the measure may bring the somewhat opposing factions they represent together. Supporters expect to encounter difficulties, primarily with the "public meetings" portion of the bill; the requirement of a two-thirds vote to go into executive session may be dropped if strong arguments are made that the provision would allow a minority to hold up important executive session matters. Some questions may also be raised about the appropriateness of the provision requiring the attorney general to review contested documents, but supporters are less likely to yield on that point, believing it would gut the documents section of the legislation.

Thusfar, members of the press and public interest groups have not rushed to get on the new bill's bandwagon, but few individuals who have been forced to rely on the FOI Act are completely satisfied with it as it now stands. Admittedly, the act has created a more open atmosphere; more often than not public bodies yield to requests for documents and follow the guidelines for executive sessions. Legislative committees no longer meet mostly in private and the news media has been able to report over the last five years on the progress of legislation from start to finish through the General Assembly. But there have been many abuses -- and a number of court decisions which have upheld secret conduct by public bodies due to the vagueness of the present law. If the members of the legislature choose this year, as they have several times in the recent past, to refuse to reform the present "Sunshine Law," then public bodies will remain only partially exposed to the sunlight, and the public in partial darkness.

ORDER OF PUBLICATION

State of South Carolina
County of Richland
IN THE COUNTY COURT
Deanne Jolly,
Plaintiff,
-vs-
Wilfred Mitchell Jolly, Defendant.

It appears from the attached Affidavit of Edna Smith Primus, Attorney for the Plaintiff, and from the verified Compliant on file in the Office of the Clerk of Court for Richland County that the above entitled action has been commenced and is now pending in this Court, and that the subject matter of this action is a Divorce.

It further appears that the Defendant, Wilfred Mitchell Jolly, has left his last known address and cannot be found and that his present whereabouts are unknown. Therefore, in accordance with SS 20-107, 10-451 to 10-454 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina, 1962, as amended,

IT IS ORDERED that the service of the SUMMONS and NOTICE in this action be made by publication of the same in the OSCEOLA NEWSWEEKLY, a newspaper published weekly in the City of Columbia, County of Richland, State of South Carolina. This paper is designated as being most likely to give notice to the Defendant; and the paper is to run the Summons and Notice once a week for three (3) consecutive weeks, with the first publication to be within ten (10) days from the date of this Order.

AND IT IS SO ORDERED.

John R.T. Major
Clerk of Clerk

March 16, 1977
Columbia, S.C.

Specials

Protesting high taxes and waste in government, opponents of income tax will picket the Columbia office of the Internal Revenue Service at the corner of Sumter and College Streets, in front of the University Horseshoe, Saturday afternoon, April 9.

The demonstration will be part of nationwide protests on National Tax Protest Day, held annually on the Saturday before April 15, the deadline for filing individual income tax returns.

Organizers of the tax protest point out that South Carolina is one of 7 states whose legislatures have voted to repeal the Sixteenth Amendment, allowing a federal income tax, and that South Carolinians of all parties are joining in the campaign for tax reduction and repeal. Contact: Lee Muller, 905 Confederate, Columbia, S.C. or call 252-2696.

Music

The Columbia Classical Guitar Quartet will present classical selections in the Trustees Gallery at the Columbia Museum of Art at 3 p.m. on Sunday, April 17th. This unique program will include selections from Praetorius, Bach, Sor, Faure, Diabelli, Hindemith, Kessner and Carulli. Arrive early for good seating for space is limited. Admission is free and the public is cordially invited to attend. A reception for the musicians will follow.

Highlight

South Carolina's first Nuclear Skeptics Conference will bring together people from across the state who have doubts about nuclear power. The conference is slated for Saturday and Sunday, April 16th and 17th at the Russell House on the University of South Carolina campus. There will be several workshops on both days of the conference, as well as a benefit concert featuring three local groups. A $10 registration fee includes lunch and dinner and the concert and multi-media show on Saturday, and overnight accommodations for those from out of town and lunch on Sunday. To pre-register, send checks to the Grass Roots Organizing Workshop (GROW), 18 Bluff Road, Columbia, S.C. 29201.
